

Find certified translators for your multilingual projects in Language123

Language123, August 24, 2005

URL: <http://www.pr9.net/business/services/2361august.html>

Many institutions, most commonly governmental and educational, require certified translation of legal documents for different processes. These translations must be done by professionals registered with national or state-level associations of translators, which usually issue certifications to some of their members based on a rigorous selection process. Acceptable certifications may vary from country to country and some times are different for various institutions, for this reason it is important to look for a translator in your geographical area.

PR9.NET August 24, 2005 - Find certified translators for your multilingual projects in Language123. The translation marketplace offers a wide array of certified translators and interpreters in many languages, "all you have to do is ask and we'll get you customized price quotes according to your requirements and needs, it is that simple" says J.C. Lievano, Business Developer for the New York based company.

Many institutions, most commonly governmental and educational, require certified translation of legal documents for different processes. These translations must be done by professionals registered with national or state-level associations of translators, which usually issue certifications to some of their members based on a rigorous selection process. Acceptable certifications may vary from country to country and some times are different for various institutions, for this reason it is important to look for a translator in your geographical area.

In the case of the United States and Canada, there are various associations of translators, with jurisdiction over a particular state or province, and national organizations like the American Translators Association (ATA) and the Canadian Translators, Terminologist and Interpreters Council (yes, CTTIC), which aim to represent translation professionals and promote quality standards and communication between translators. Certifications issued by these organizations are usually accepted by most institutions; certified translators are usually given a registration number, which allows the institution to corroborate their competence.

For certain judicial proceedings, a translation by a court certified translator may be required, in which case you should try to find a professional certified within the same jurisdiction. It is always good to ask if a certified translation is required; in many cases you can go for an affidavit of translation, which is an statement by the translator that says that the translation is true and accurate to the best of his/her knowledge and ability, signed by a Notary Public and including the translator's contact information.

To find a certified translator for your documents, email Language123 at requests@language123.com, call toll-free in the US and Canada 1888.526.4123 and in the UK 0208.43.26.215, or visit them at <http://language123.com/web/user/lead.cgi> to submit your project for free. Language123 will notify you every time a new quote arrives and store it in their system for your convenience. You can compare prices and profiles online, choose your favorite candidate and save time and money.

To see a list of certified translators in various languages in dozens of countries, go to http://language123.com/web/common/search\_translator.cgi. You can search their database by languages, services offered, name and location; they have hundreds of certified translators at your service. There is also a support team ready to assist you through out the process of finding the right translator for your projects.

Language123 was launched into the Internet in September 2004 as a solution for translators and interpreters looking to expand their market and get more work, using the internet as a boundless platform to interact with clients, colleagues and agencies worldwide. Since then they have continuously work to achieve a level of quality and efficiency for the benefit of their members as a community, and to make it easier and faster to find a language professional anywhere at any time.

###

About Language123

Language123 is a translation market place. Find translators, or promote your translation services online. For more information about our services, features and the future of the translation market on the internet, please go to http://language123.com/web/common/contact\_us.cgi

Phone: 18885264123
Website: <http://language123.com>