Here's how to get started if you are looking at a voiceover career. For becoming a voice over artist, the first thing that you need to do is get some basic training for your voice. This could include enrolling with some voice modulation classes or even signing up with a voice over coaching class. This will help you gain that professional edge to your voice, which is entirely desirable in a voiceover actor. Once you are done with the training, you are ready to get started as a voiceover artist. Now the next step would be to cut a voice over demo at one of the many recording studio in your city or at your own home recording studio. Now comes the next question, where do we find suitable voice over work for voice talents? The answer would be a website like Voice123.com. They require a new voiceover artist to become a member in order to make use of the benefits they have to offer. When you enroll you are asked to upload your resume on the site, along with your voice over demo. The profile of the registered voice talent is then visible to a host of employers. The member can also search for a voice over job that matches up to their expectation from the thousands of voice over assignments listed on the website.

For talent seekers, Voice123 serves as a resume bank of voiceover professionals. Hundreds of new voiceover projects get uploaded on our website every week. These could range from a project for voicemail greetings to voice over commercials; from voice over dubbing to on hold messages.
