When a small turboprop airliner crashes in the Rocky Mountains west of Denver, the only survivors are a man and a boy sitting far back in the tail of the plane; Jason, a thirty-two year old confirmed bachelor with an aversion to commitment, and Billy, a twelve year old foul-mouthed boy-genius with an attitude problem. For the first three days they huddle in the wreckage of the airplane waiting to be rescued, and then, fearing they might be snowed in for the winter, they spend another five days hiking back down out of the rugged high-country wilderness. Though initially strangers, a close father-son bond develops, and Billy wants Jason to become his new dad. Jason is reluctant to take on such a responsibility, but he does finally agree to the idea providing Billy will try to clean up his act. When they finally get back to Denver, however, Jason discovers that things are not altogether what they had seemed.

Harold Hansen is a retired NASA Senior Project Engineer who helped pioneer the Manned Space Program at the Kennedy Space Center. He was born and raised in Flint, Michigan, is a World War II Veteran, and received his engineering degree from Wayne University in Detroit. He has two children and two grandchildren and currently lives in Tallahassee.
