New car prices are on the rise but is the buyer any more informed of the options and extra costs involved? This free online service is offering great advice for new car buyers that will reduce costs and frustrations.

PR9.NET June 25, 2007 - Cypress, TX - www.trustmymechanic.com has been helping visitors online with their auto repair problems for over 5 years, now they are helping new car shoppers as well. The new blog contains new car reviews, pictures and online videos as well as answers from visitor questions. "The visitor reaction to this new free service is overwhelmingly positive", says Austin Davis, owner of the blog.

"Buying a new car is a huge investment and time and homework is needed before the buyer signs on the dotted line", says Davis. The main website contains a very active online forum board where visitors from all over the world come to post and answer car related questions free of charge.

In addition to the many interesting articles about car repair the site also has pictures of commonly referenced car parts that the customer might have heard of before but has no idea what it looks like or what the part actually does on their car and how they can tell it needs repairs.
