FreeAdLists.com launches its free online classifieds service to serve the worldwide market. The goal is to create an effective yet free medium where advertisers can market their goods and services or request such goods and services when necessary.

PR9.NET August 05, 2007 - Songtan, South Korea - FreeAdLists.com has just announced the launch of its free classifieds service. The service is not restrictive and membership of the site is open to all countries provided the prospective users need the service and are willing to adhere to the no spam policy of the website.

According to Roy Wood, the founder of the service, "The aim is to create a medium for buyers and sellers of good and services to advertise their requests freely over the Internet. The reach of other free classified sites is limited because of the cost factor. FreeAdLists.com offers you the wide reach of a paid classifieds site without charging any fees for regular ads whatsoever."

The website is easy to use and the signup process involves few vital questions that all prospective users must answer. However, the simplicity of the website is no indication of the effort being put in by the support staff running the service, great emphasis is placed on the security of information as well as user compliance with standard terms and conditions. New customers will be pleased to note that the service has a strong anti-fraud mechanism in place to detect potentially misleading and fraudulent ads.

Credit is quickly rolling in for the new service but a few critics are comparing the site with other services of a similar nature like Craigslist, Backpage and Classifieds 2000. This is a notion user like Pierre Sarkozy a French member of the site quickly dismisses: "FreeAdsList is a distinctly different service, the site is easy to use and offers language support for users who don't speak English, and you also get more replies per ad."

Michael Beck of Digital Nomad said, "Roy aka esofthub, is one of my first contacts from MyBlogLog. I originally was attracted to his blog on telephony because of mutual interests in things wireless. Roy is prolific with blogging, always testing and experimenting...like with his new easy to use free ads site."

Support is available for other languages like German, French, Spanish and eventually Hangul; you can't find this type of service anywhere else.
