PR9.NET August 21, 2007 - Chicago, Ill. - In the nonfiction book, "Motive to Kill," author Elvis Slaughter reveals his interpretations of research surrounding the death of his mother, who died in 1997 following a series of transfusions of what was later determined to be tainted blood. While the book attempts to link negligent practices regarding her transfusions, Slaughter reveals how medical, bureaucratic and informational delays voided recourse for victims in similar situations as the statute of limitations ran out. The author expresses his opinion regarding the motives for his mother's death and the blood recall announcement delay that affected thousands of tainted blood transfusion victims. According to Slaughter, they all had the same operandi.
