Market leader Voices.com introduces the concept of voice over through images on the company's newest blog, Voice Illustrated.

PR9.NET October 12, 2007 - Toronto, Canada – If the axiom "a picture is worth a thousand words" is applicable to the use and study of the human voice, the newly appointed graphical hotspot of the voice over industry, Voice Illustrated, competently communicates important objectives on behalf of voice actors and the voice over community at large through highly innovative images and creative concepts as portrayed in each topic posted.

To serve people who prefer to consume information visually or those who are looking for a little something extra, Voice Illustrated offers more than just a run of the mill experience, presenting a feast for the eyes as well as hard hitting, sometimes political views on voice acting, part of the ever tumultuous entertainment industry full of rising stars, movie trailer tycoons and an appetite for the exquisite.

Voices.com Chief Executive Officer, David Ciccarelli, says, "The Voice Illustrated blog is a marriage of the visual arts movement and real life imagery that shines the limelight on voice acting events, celebrities, happenings, satire, and the occasional motion picture. We hope you enjoy the show."
