The Assessor's review highlighted the importance of values and ethics within the business, the fact that communication is strong throughout the organisation and that the Learning and Development function is key to the success of Tate.

PR9.NET December 09, 2007 - London, UK - Tate, specialists in office support recruitment, was first accredited with Investors in People status in June 1997, has just been re-accredited with the status. This is a great achievement for Tate as it is the first IIP accreditation since the business re-branded and since it brought together all the legacy brands and all the UK locations under the Tate brand. This has involved the integration of many different cultures and working styles under the single vision of being the "best everywhere all the time", and has clearly paid off.

The Assessor's review highlighted the importance of values and ethics within the business, the fact that communication is strong throughout the organisation and that the Learning and Development function is key to the success of Tate. A quote from the Assessor demonstrates this – "There is a really strong sense of teamwork across the organisation...Learning and development has been prioritised to address the core development required for the business".

During her visits to the various sites, the Assessor uncovered the fact that the "people believe they are recognised and appreciated for their work" and that "staff believe the benefits package and Tate's approach to work life balance is very positive and continues to improve". With the company's ability to set realistic targets, motivate, reward and develop staff, maintain an effective and supportive management team and keep a family friendly approach; it is not surprising that the staff retention rate is going from strength to strength within Tate. The overall sentiment was echoed in the thoughts of one of the employees – "if I left Tate, I would leave recruitment because I truly believe that no one else out there does office support recruitment better than we do!"

Note to editors - Tate is one of the UK's leading experts in placing temporary and permanent office personnel. Since 1985, Tate has been sourcing and placing the most able candidates into organisations deserving of their talents. Such is the confidence in delivering a superior standard of service, Tate offer the industry unique Tate Watertight Guarantee.
